So, I always start with that natural, however I can elicit that sound that they might already be doing through animal noises or car noises or train noises or whatever it's called. And so, I usually use animal noises like a growling sound to elicit that "grr" sound in the back.

Therapy

The book Eliciting Sounds: Techniques and Strategies for Clinicians, is just one of those references I think every SLP should have on their bookshelf. I particularly like how it

Online Library Eliciting Sounds

breaks down strategies according to different types of cues as sometimes I find that some kids are, for example, more stimulable for motor-kinesthetic cues.

Try /l/ee, /l/oo, /l/aah, etc. If the child has difficulty switching from vowel to vowel just practice one vowel, /l/ee. Ask the child to raise and lower their tongue up and down when producing the /l/ee. At this point, demonstrate to the child the contrast in mouth shape and movement between the /l/ and /w/ phonemes.

Online Library Eliciting Sounds

lips apart to say “uh”. It should sound like “oooouh”.
/m/ The /m/ sound is produced by pushing the lips together and humming.

I have grouped these sounds together because they are

Online Library Eliciting Sounds

produced in the same manner and place. The only difference between the /t/ and /d/ sounds is the /d/ sound is voiced while the /t/ sound is not. If your child can produce a /t/ sound and not the /d/ sound

Online Library Eliciting Sounds

you simply teach them to “turn on their voice” for the /d/ sound.

I elicit the /er/ sound by telling students to “tickles your big teeth up in the back of your mouth (they’re called “molars”) with the sides of your tongue. Can you do it? Eek! I can! Now...say “errrrrrrrrrr” like a lion growling, or
