Midwifery in Britain in the Twentieth Century. Midwifery became legally recognised in Britain in 1902 with the first Midwives Act. Despite this, there continued to be a large proportion of women who were supported by midwives who had not been formally trained. "Before the First World War and, in some areas, until the mid-1930's, the majority of working-class women in Britain were attended in childbirth not by a professional but by a local woman" (Leap and Hunter 1993:1).
