Moral Treatment Of Returning Warriors
Soldiers returning from war have always exhibited signs of psychological and emotional distress. In this book, Bernard J. Verkamp argues that the contemporary response to such symptoms—psychiatric treatment and therapy—is only a partial solution, and that when dealing with soldiers’ emotions of guilt and shame we would benefit greatly from a consideration of the religiously grounded practices of the Middle Ages.

This work is the first book-length study devoted exclusively to a scholarly and systematic analysis of how soldiers returning from battle have been, or should be, treated morally. Long-scattered historical material is pulled together from a variety of sources to show why and how the early medieval custom of imposing penances on returning warriors first originated, and then, by the end of the Middle Ages, had lapsed into disuse.

The Moral Treatment of Returning Warriors in Early ...
As Bernard J. Verkamp explains in his important work, The Moral Treatment of Returning Warriors in Early Medieval and Modern Times, in the early Middle Ages, Christian knights returning from war were required to do penance for acts committed during wartime that were seen as “sinful” (including injuring and killing other humans), even if the war had been judged to be a just war by the Church. As Verkamp explains:

Warrior Transitions: From Combat to Social Contract
Early medieval theologians, treating the moral pain of returning warriors were definitely onto something. Why has it taken us so long, so many wars to realize this? Gai Eaton suggests a reason for this delay when he writes about our paternalistic disdain for the intellect and contributions of our ancestors: -

Despite its title, this book does not really provide a thorough examination of the moral treatment of returning warriors in the early medieval period. Verkamp has made a survey of other people's studies of medieval theological writings, so the notes in the back of this book are helpful. The same can be said of Verkamp's material on “modern times.”
