The importance of supervision in child protection is also emphasised in the evidence we reviewed (Bartoli and Kennedy 2015). Given the focus on supervision for supporting NQSWs, questions are raised about whether it is fair, or even possible, for supervisors to be responsible for the development of new graduates, safeguarding children, and the administrative duties required by their organisation.

The potential role stress faced by practitioners who are required to strengthen families to care for their children, whilst maintaining a central focus on the safety and best interests of the child, imply a need for well informed, reflective and emotionally attuned supervision. Practitioners in child protection practice also work in a world where evidence informed practice is demanded by employers, the Courts and external inquiry bodies.

area that has come under particular scrutiny. The emotional impact of child protection work is well documented (Harvey and Henderson, 2014). In her review of child protection in England, Munro (2010, 2011) identifies that there can be a high personal cost to being exposed to powerful and often negative emotions involved in this area of work.
