The chief cause is the presence in the wine of the chemical compounds TCA (2,4,6-trichloroanisole), and – to a lesser extent – TBA (2,4,6-tribromoanisole). These are chlorinated and brominated derivatives of the anisole organic compound, the ether associated with aniseed. TCA is often treated as a synonym for the more general term, cork taint.

Since wine comes in so many different varietals, there's no solid answer as to how quickly it goes bad. The exact timing depends on the type and quality of the wine. But to give you an estimate, most opened wines will spoil in the range of two to five days. (Sparkling wines have an even shorter lifespan; they'll go flat in about a day.)
